KERRIN MCCADDEN Burial

The father will keep the son on ice, keep him cold so the body will last the day, the tractor spinning its wheels inside the circular driveway, the bucket pulling up the front yard, piling soil under the box elders. The choir will sing around his bed with us, and one man will be a kind of clown, unable to make any face but his frozen one so that he looks like he is singing the tractor song while we sing songs we don't know, say words that sound like words in songbooks until we play a game of singing, sounding like we are praying in tongues, but we will have to sing or listen to the tractor out front, digging. When the word is Alleluia, the room will ring, the syllables clear to us like water at Nichols Pond. You will think this is bad planning—the digging drone underneath the song. Won't it be in poor taste, the tractor blatting its own song in the front yard? The tractor is a water strider in the front yard, its legs like oars to each side, but it has nowhere to go, it refuses to dig anywhere else, sounding like a furnace in an old home. You will speak over it, or sing, anything. When the woodcock comes to circle the house, someone will lower the pine box. It will be so quiet then. It will be hard to believe the woodcock's song doesn't come from its throat.
