CHRISTOPHER MUNDE What Was Gentle Has Turned Careful

[Surveying the quiet auditoriums for effects left behind, my father is alone at work tonight when he falls unconscious falls straight down the aisle stairs to wake standing beside his daughter's bed at home. It feels late and like winter it feels electric and cold like the eve of every holiday and he's home, his tie still tight and the house quiet.]

> The doctor tells him to always seat himself when the dizziness starts and, unable to afford something better, he does, and so the next time it comes he passes right out in an auditorium chair and dreams he's at someone else's job, bending to adjust the spray of artificial rain on three bodies lying in grass.

[No eyes: Lids only. He tucks his sleeping daughter in gently, so she stays asleep, but then he notices the snoring: hers, and his wife's, the family's breathing, the house idling.]

He's a pathologist, he realizes, at a body farm, and rises from the water spigot, the measured weather washing him for a second. He doesn't know if this is how the other pathologists do it, but it's how he does it.

[Shirt, pants off. In the blue night of his bedroom, he shakes his wallet onto the bed and draws out the check from the Canal St. job, then the cash from the one on West 4th and lays it all on the nightstand beside his wife.]

The three in the grass are the surrogates for a family murdered and found in a park; the three have only conceptual blood in common, bloodshed in common. Even my father doesn't know what they all actually died of.

THe feels

they're like dreams, his wife and daughter, though he is awake, like this is a zoo for dreams. He knows all he believes about them was programmed at the moment he entered their rooms: his daughter had, somewhere, a fourteenth birthday, his wife wanted the kitchen bigger, the bedroom different.]

He doesn't know if the woman below really has a child out there, if the girl ever wore anything like this blue jumper, if the boy had ever pretended to be someone else, to be killed, before. [Like seeing dreams

while awake, reasoning them and the offering on the nightstand barely ruffled by his wife's breathing. When he woke in two hours, they'd be gone, dreamlike: daughter to school, for science he knew,
somehow, wife to work at the lab.]

These discrepancies

don't register on the time of death, on the physical matter of decomposition. Look, they look so much softer today, a red tumble flung together holding in rain; who wouldn't believe they had struggled, and loved each other—

He's letting them be now.

After he's placed the careful marks he's careful to fade back to body, auditorium, the shapes still reclining in his eye it's their lids on his eyes—and branding the stage ahead.

He watches. The processes

[take them.]