KARL ELDER Ode in the Kev of O

Kudos unto the code and to the mind behind the hand that moved not out of need but what must be acknowledged as a thought nonpareil—stone turned wheel no exception the crude scrawl (in ashes, sand, and soil with stick or staff) that which it did not know to call symbol, yet would bring to recall the awe uttered as O on the rounded mouth below the eyes of one fixed upon the moon's shape, if not in worship, wonder.

Yea, as if a remnant of gods gone ghost gleaned from the air by the hand of a mime, like approximation of perfection, that diminutive orb wholly without substance rolled from the tongue, made corporal by yet another eidolon, the line call it divine insight when the pupil of the mind's eye eclipses iris to highlight, through swift abstraction, the concrete.

Ought it then not be, after the grand span of five hundred generations, given the cuneiform-like illusion of form born of the fact of annularity, our alacrity to the degree it has not atrophied to hilarity at the writ of the clock is-while more minute each minute—worthy, too, of praise?

For value in its purest form is less a matter of matter than the marriage of light and shade, their interdependency in the sense, say, male and female were one from the beginning-no little arrow on the O of that embryo, no foe, target, cross, or stickman Atlas below.

Lo, behold: lift like Sol's soul o from god there's no g. d. (or even dad gummed) thing to which we cling if not—à la lingua franca more so than the thing itself, life buoy or lasso—awe, the ineffable grasped as we're pulled, gasping, through h. to o.

Thus, as it's said, at the apogee of one's gestation there is the crowning; there is as well the splash, and there is the circle of attendants, the cry, the swaddling, the mother's embrace, infant to her breast.

Yet, life is birth's twist: in time time doesn't exist, birth flanked by nothing of the past, no word of the future when, alas, love's orismo's most fierce in fear of life's loss.

O, of the holes in the whole of our knowledge we say miracle, though the miracle, mother of miracles, is we say it.

As for love's spell—phallic l, mellow o vis-à-vis Eve's cleft v v. snake eye e—is it not awe to which we owe our awe?
