On the Senses

Mount Desert

Mechthild says
the senses
are where anyone
may speak:
God, the devil,
& all creatures.

I stood in the garden
of my soul
& closed my eyes.

Men toiled
to grade roads
for the carriages
of the wealthy here. Their works
last awhile.

I strode
in silence, a stiff
breeze whipping
whitecaps
on the surface
of the clear pond.

I rejoiced,
at last,
in the decrepitude
of my body.

Concerning
burned love,
Mechthild wrote.

Concerning
the hunger cloth.
Speak then, Mercator. Shake the ash from your lips, silky like ground pearls mixed with oil.
The freshness. I watched a maple steam gently in the dawnlight.
Sip from the fossil threading the temple's shadow.
The wind chalks it up & then back down again—recidivist, skeined as though for psalm.
