About The Exhibit

Sometimes the most important thing to search for is not the answers, but the questions. As final assignment for the course Design Thinking Studio: Hacking Your Innovation Mindset we challenged our students to frame questions that mattered to them. It seems like a simple task, but as they delved deeper into their questions they found that it required continuous reframing. As they experimented with sparking conversations and exploring multiple perspectives, their questions evolved. They found themselves asking questions not just about what is, but what might be.

Each artifact in today's exhibit represents a student's question as it is in this moment in time. We hope they provoke you to join us in our ongoing quest for transforming and transformative questions.

About The Course

Design Thinking Studio: Hacking Your Innovation Mindset is a core d.school course that leads graduate students across disciplines on an exploration of their identity as creative individuals who go on to foster a culture of innovation in teams and organizations by applying design thinking. The Fall 2018 cohort includes students from education, business, civil and environmental engineering, management science and engineering, sustainability science and practice, earth systems, mechanical engineering, as well as visiting researchers, and a Ukrainian Emerging Leaders Program Fellow.
