

Heinken response to Justice For Myanmar (April 17, 2023):

“Our main priority in Myanmar continues to be the safety and livelihoods of our people, their families and those connected to our business. By maintaining our presence, we are living up to our long-term commitment to our employees and the communities related to our business.

“We have done our due diligence and are assured that our Myanmar business has no ties with the military. However, as a responsible business under local and international standards, we are obligated to pay taxes in all markets we operate in. Fulfilling our obligations in Myanmar does not represent our support to the government in question. We stand by the joint statement made with many other international and local businesses through the Myanmar Centre for Responsible Business, which can be found here.

“We observe local and international developments in Myanmar closely and routinely consult local NGOs, international organisations and multilateral institutions, including the EU and UN, for advice.”
