The crew were a mixed bag of emotions. On one hand they were so happy to have the Jumble Twins back, on the other hand everyone was worried that they'd all turn to stone like Bronze Child, if they didn't find their Wellness Orbs.

To take everyone's mind off the worry, Oscar thought he'd take a scenic detour through the Canadian Rockies.

The view from up in the clouds was stunning and they all looked on in awe.

All except Akky, who was curled up in a crooked ball at the back of the boat, feeling stressed and cramped.

The adventure so far had been tough on them all, with little time to rest. But Akky felt as though he had been particularly unhelpful, and decided that he was of no use to anyone.

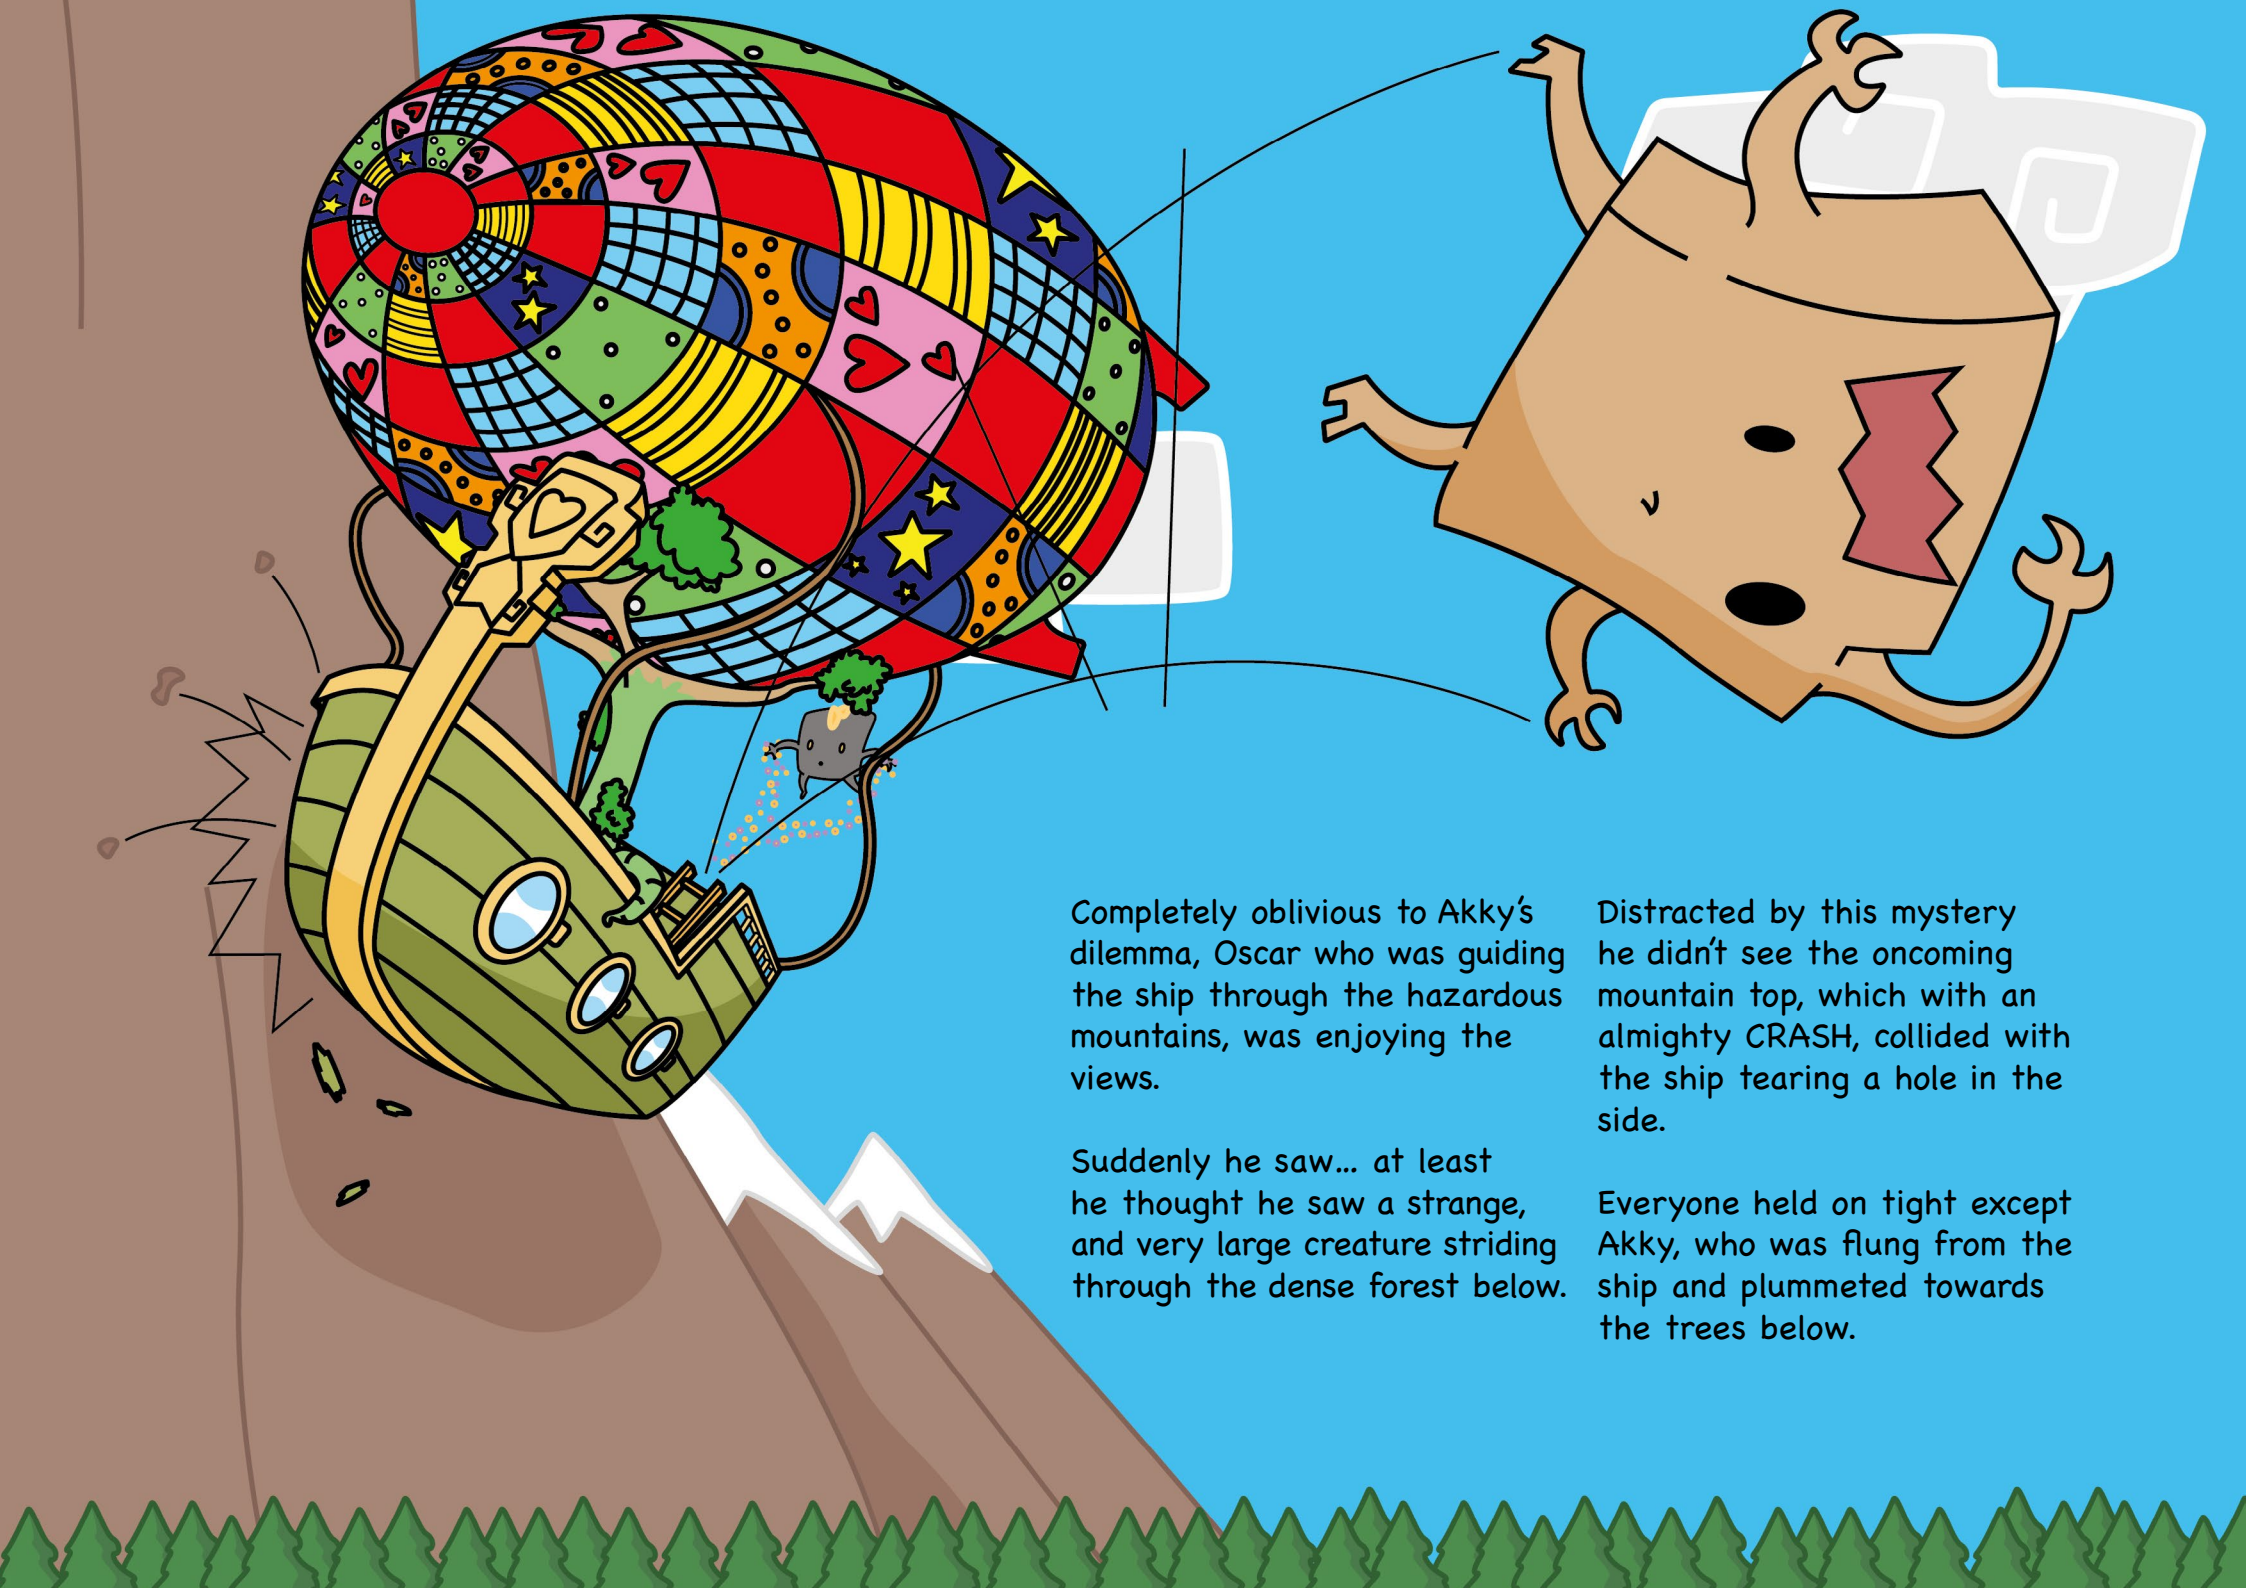

This was entirely untrue of course, but little Akky sometimes got himself into this state.

And when he did he slipped into the background without a whisper.

Perhaps a walk would do him good, he thought, but with little chance for a wander whilst in the air, he stayed put.

Completely oblivious to Akky's dilemma, Oscar who was guiding the ship through the hazardous mountains, was enjoying the views.

Suddenly he saw... at least he thought he saw a strange, and very large creature striding through the dense forest below.

Distracted by this mystery he didn't see the oncoming mountain top, which with an almighty CRASH, collided with the ship tearing a hole in the side.

Everyone held on tight except Akky, who was flung from the ship and plummeted towards the trees below.

Akky fell for what seemed like an eternity. He could see the tree line getting closer at an alarming rate and he shut his eyes tight.

He'd fallen from heights before, and although he had been fine it was never a fun thing to do. So doing what he did best, Akky expected the worst.

He then realised that he'd stopped falling completely. Opening his eyes just a bit he looked around confused at two large hairy hands that appeared to have caught him.

He then looked up to see a big hairy face smiling down at him. Akky let out a shriek.
