...extraordinary experiences—intense, overwhelming, indescribable—are recorded at every time in history and in every place on the globe and are widespread in America society today. No one with any familiarity with history or anthropology or psychology can deny they occur. They are a form of ‘altered states of consciousness’—to use the current approved phrase—something like intoxication or delirium or a hypnotic trance but different in their intensity, their joyfulfulness and their ‘lifting out’ dimension. In some cases, such experiences were triggered by drugs, in others by ritual dances, in still others by disciplined meditation; but most such ‘ecstatic interludes’ about which we have accounts seem to be purely spontaneous—a man casually walking by a tennis court suddenly is caught up in a wave of peace and joy ‘as time stands still.’

—Sociologist Andrew Greeley writing in the New York Times Magazine

Before Charles Darwin published The Origin of Species, the Victorian middle-class indulged themselves by collecting biological and zoological specimens. Similarities were noted, but an evolutionary view of their linkage would have to wait for Darwin’s book.

According to Michael Murphy we are in a similar predicament when it comes to understanding paranormal experience. Our religious and metaphysical traditions have long recognized supernatural human capacities, but each tradition is isolated in its own belief system with little connection to each other. And considering the fact that paranormal events have been documented since the beginning of history, it is ironic that we in the Western technological societies are still arguing about whether they occur as opposed to what they mean. Perhaps that is because meaning is not a thread but a tapestry—a web of relationships as opposed to a string of coincidences. Michael Murphy appears to view the long history of “numinous” or supernatural phenomena as geographical points waiting to be turned into a map: the information is there, but it needs to be linked. If this seems like a big undertaking, it is, but Murphy is well-suited to the challenge.

As founder and chairman of the board of Esalen Institute, Murphy has been in a unique position to view the nearly three decades of attempts by our best and brightest to fulfill the institute’s goal “to devise ways of extending man’s human potential.” As a student of the great Hindu mystic, Aurobindo, he is familiar with the struggle to unite divine consciousness with historical processes. As a novelist who’s consistent theme has been one of physical transformation, his creative imagination is well-tuned. And with his collection of out of context experiences in fields as diverse as sports, medicine, mathematics and the arts, Murphy’s long effort to write “a natural history of the future” has already attracted intense attention a full year and a half before it is due for publication.

According to Murphy, “The book is an assembly of data and proposals about a frontier that I believe we can now explore.” We asked Michael Murphy to explore a bit of that frontier with Magical Blend.

You have compared some of the so-called “coincidences” of everyday life like knowing who’s on the phone when it rings to Freudian slips, could you explain?

MICHAEL MURPHY: In his celebrated essay, “The Psychopathology of Everyday Life,” Freud taught us that many common activities, among them jokes and slips of the tongue, expressed unrecognized thoughts and motives. I believe that activities such as the one you mentioned also express an aspect of our unconscious functioning, namely our latent supernormality.

You have called these latent expressions of supernormality “siddhis of everyday life.” Could you explain what siddhis are?

MICHAEL MURPHY: Siddhis are special capacities resulting from the practice of yoga. I believe that such powers are supernatural analogs to everyday abilities that we all have. Thus I call these more common expressions of supernormality “siddhis of everyday life” because they were not produced by yoga or other transformative discipline. They seem, instead, to be part of a general human endowment, though just a few are recognized by contemporary psychology or emphasized by modern education.

If these paranormal experiences, or “everyday siddhis” as you call them, are happening spontaneously, what does that suggest about their nature?

MICHAEL MURPHY: The fact that they arise in all sorts of people, even though they aren’t cultivated or

Everday siddhis are simply less developed aspects of a greater nature pressing to be realized..."}

Comparing the experiences of everyday people to the experiences of religious adepts would seem like comparing apples to oranges. What prompted you to make a connection between the two? And what does this connection represent?

Michael Murphy: My own inquiries among friends, acquaintances and seminar audiences during the past 20 years have convinced me that many, if not most people have noetic or paranormal episodes without benefit of transformative practice. Furthermore, these spontaneous experiences exhibit more variety than I had ever guessed. As I have collected reports about such events, I have discovered certain features they share with activities which are clearly supernatural. Comparing the experiences of these “everyday siddhis” with various kinds of supernatural functioning, we find correspondences which lead us straightforwardly to suppose the former are first expressions of the latter.

You have put a great deal of effort into listing and categorizing these everyday paranormal occurrences. What purpose do you see these lists serving?

Michael Murphy: A cross-matrix between “siddhis of everyday life” and supernatural capacities give us a way to search for non-ordinary abilities we have not yet recognized. Like a Table of Elements, a matrix of this kind might suggest undiscovered aspects of our human potential. Indeed, with such a map in mind I’ve been prompted to look for particular kinds of nascent “siddhi”, thus discovering some of the powers described in my list of spontaneous supernormalities. [See following list]. I wouldn’t have guessed, for example, that so many acquaintances had realized “self-existent delight” if I hadn’t been led to ask them about it by recognizing its centrality for religious contemplatives; nor would I have thought that many people had superordinate kinesthetic perceptions if I hadn’t heard stories that yogis can perceive their own cells and atom patterns. On the other hand, I hadn’t considered shamanic agility to be an aspect of supernatural embodiment until I heard several athletes innocent about mysticism describe some of their self-transcendent feats. We can uncover latent powers in two ways, then: by extrapolating from nascent non-ordinary abilities to capacities that are truly supernatural, and vice versa.

You have said that not only do you believe that the “everyday siddhis” may be forerunners to the siddhis encountered in transformative practice, but that both may be products of an evolutionary trend. Could you explain?

Michael Murphy: Several correspondences between these two orders of experience and various aspects of animal functioning suggest certain lines of development through the separate domains of animal, human, and supernatural evolution. As I have suggested, the continuing
Tune Out the Electromagnetic Hazard

Media reports continue to link cancer, birth defects, lowered resistance, fatigue, and stress with the electromagnetic pollution in our environment. These reports cite computers, powerlines, appliances, broadcast signals, and home wiring as hazards to the integrity of human cells.

Tune In to the Pulse of the Earth!

Not all electromagnetic fields are harmful! The earth emits a natural electromagnetic field of 7 to 8 Hertz. Humans are genetically designed to use this ambient field—just as we are designed to use oxygen and sunlight. But today, the earth’s ambient field is all but blotted out by powerful, manmade electromagnetic fields of unhealthful frequencies.

- The Micro Equalizer™ provides a personal electromagnetic field equivalent to the earth’s natural field. It restores a natural harmony that “progress” has disturbed.
- Micro Equalizer™ users report increased energy, calmness, lowered stress, and travel fatigue. Give the Micro Equalizer™ one month to improve your well-being. If you’re pleased, keep your Micro Equalizer™ and tell your friends. If not, return it to us for a cheerful refund. No medical claim is made or implied.
- The Micro Equalizer™ is a high-quality, affordable Earth Pulse Generator. It has two settings—work/play and meditation—and carries a three-year replacement warranty.

This is a magical story for children of all ages. The ferocious lion, the king of the jungle, is transformed by love into the philosopher king of peace.
Extraordinary kinesthesia.
- picturing arteries, capillaries, lymph nodes, or other bodily structures that immediately seem to be your own, sometimes sensing they may be injured or (conversely) in a process of recovery from injury or stress
- experiencing exceptional muscular freedom during strenuous exercise, as for example during a long run or swim
- determining by spontaneous tastes or smells your level of stress during extreme exertion
- picturing what appear to be “chakras” depicted in esoteric teachings, or other organs corresponding to the subtle bodies of yogic lore
- hearing strange sounds which seem to rise from the body, and sensing their origin and meaning

Extraordinary communication.
- correctly intuiting someone’s negative feelings or thoughts about you or a third party
- saying something unexpected in unison with someone else
- writing to a friend you haven’t communicated with for a long time at approximately the same time they write you
- sensing correctly who is calling on the telephone, even though the caller hasn’t communicated for a long time—or thinking about someone who then calls you
- sensing a powerful communication with a plant or animal
- feeling no separation from your lover during sexual intercourse
- feeling sympathetic pains with a distant friend or relative
- “feeling” what someone else is thinking
- picking up another person’s thoughts telepathically
- sensing the mood and intention of a pet or other animal
- sharing the same nocturnal dream with a friend
- sharing sensations of well-being or distress with friends or relatives though there is no ordinary communication between you
- accurately sensing someone’s prayers in your behalf

Extraordinary heat, energy and vitality
- feeling great warmth on cold days, without benefit of extra clothing or other protection
- experiencing immense energy, sometimes frightening in its intensity, for which there is no apparent cause
- sensing a rush of electricity up the spine, or radiating out from the abdomen, accompanied by strange perceptions, altered states of mind, or extraordinary strength
- remaining free of infection in the midst of general sickness among people around you
- going without normal amounts of sleep for extended periods without loss of mental clarity, vitality and physical strength

Extraordinary movement.
- executing moves in sport that exceed one’s normal ability and which seem to be mediated by a power or “self” beyond one’s ordinary functioning
- sensing physical levitation during strenuous physical exercise, a religious service, or some other event
- moving into “other worlds” during sleep
- out-of-body experience (during which you see your own body perhaps) after which you report details of locations or events which could not be known to you through the ordinary senses

Extraordinary affections.
- experiencing a complete loss of boundaries between you and a loved one, as if you and they were one person, consciousness, or body
- looking at someone (or something) familiar and seeing them as if for the first time, with a great sense of spontaneity and delight

Extraordinary delight
- experiencing profound joy for no apparent reason, during a routine task perhaps, or even in the midst of pain or discomfort, and being struck that such joy doesn’t depend upon the satisfaction of a particular need or desire. This state may be attributed, simply, to the “joy of living”
- and, with the above, a contagious effect upon others by which they too experience a self-existent delight

Extraordinary cognition
- correctly sensing unexpected danger
- anticipating a melody before it comes on the radio; anticipating a dramatic event before it happens; or imagining a sentence before a companion says it
- apprehending a situation or place as if you had experienced it before (“déjà vu”)
- apprehending an exceptionally complex and original thought or other mental production all-at-once
- cognizing something truly original in conjunction with sensations of inspiration and joy
- experiencing a sense of mystical union with God, in a common situation perhaps, during a festive event, or while engaged in intimate conversation
- remembering extremely complex material with perfect detail (eidetic imagery)
- correctly determining historical events connected with a particular location or object (psychometry)
- spontaneously apprehending the presence, voice or other aspect of someone who is physically distant or dead, by direct and vivid contact
- tasting a particular food before it is unexpectedly served to you

Extraordinary volition
- waking up from sleep at a designated moment, without assistance from an alarm
- shedding great pain, simply by resolution
- accomplishing some deed requiring strength or endurance beyond one’s usual capacity, in a crisis perhaps, or during a sports competition
- spontaneously adapting to great heat, cold, or other adverse conditions
- spontaneously exerting subliminal influence upon others, harmonizing conflicting parties, for example, or reversing potentially violent situations
- finding odd details in photographs you’ve taken which don’t correspond to the objects you photographed
- overcoming the effects of poisons, spoiled food, and other toxins
- spontaneously throwing off the effects of injury or disease
- deliberately rising above thirst or hunger, with no apparent loss of energy or strength

Extraordinary alteration of the inorganic or living environment
- appearing to alter the flight of a ball during golf, baseball, or other games by an act of will (telekinesis)
- altering ambient room temperature as if by some sort of psychokinesis
- leaving a strong mood in an empty room by religious ritual, powerful emotion, or sustained prayer and meditation
- promoting the growth of plants in extraordinary fashion by some sort of “green thumb”
- conveying a sense of well-being to others
- repairing broken devices which others could not fix with the same procedure
- appearing to influence the weather

Extraordinary beauty
- suddenly assuming a beautiful appearance to others, without benefit of make-up, costume or other adornments

Extraordinary bodily changes
- spontaneously assuming a more youthful appearance, or retaining a youthful appearance into later life
