The Mud Island Section of the Wolf River Greenway opened to the public in October 2017 and is located at the north end of Mud Island adjacent to the confluence of the Mississippi and Wolf River. Prior to 2014, this property was vacant, and the site of illegal dumping. In accordance with its mission and vision, Wolf River Conservancy acquired it, and worked to transform it into the crucial community amenity it is today. The Mud Island section of the trail is the gateway to the remaining 25 miles of Greenway trail being constructed through the City of Memphis. This scenic portion of the Greenway trail features a 1.2-mile loop along the old Wolf River Levee built to divert the flow of the Wolf River in 1960. When you stand atop this levee, you are literally standing on top of history! The Greenway trail hugs the banks of this historic section of the Wolf River, with benches overlooking both rivers and ADA-accessible picnic tables. The Mud Island section connects with River Line, Tom Lee Park, and Big River Crossing, making it a crucial midpoint for hundreds of miles of trails in Tennessee and Arkansas.

The Mud Island Section boasts dramatic views of the confluence the Wolf and Mississippi rivers. It is the gateway to 22 Memphis neighborhoods and 863 acres of conserved land along the Wolf River, providing a vital greenspace for humans and a corridor of wildlife habitat through the city. Though the urban Wolf River was once severely impacted by decades of industrial pollution it is much improved since the 1970’s, when it was declared ecologically dead. This has changed as the Wolf River now supports numerous species of wildlife and plants. Today, one can spot species of frogs, turtles, herons, beavers, white tailed deer, and more wildlife while walking along the Wolf River Greenway trail.
