The paved and unpaved trails along the Wolf River at Kennedy Park wind through mature bottomland forest habitat full of diverse wildlife. During spring and fall migration, the woods are full of birdsong from warblers, tanagers, indigo buntings and many other species. Though this section of the river was channelized in the 1960’s, damaging many wetlands, a beautiful oxbow lake remains as a reminder of the past and a home for frogs, turtles, herons, beavers, river otters and more. To further enhance habitat for wildlife, Wolf River Conservancy staff and volunteers have placed bird and bat houses along the trail, in addition to picking up litter, removing invasive plants, and other beautification activities.
