Call #208:

MidJourney

Prompts for Utilizing MidJourney:

1. Think of one practical application you want to use MidJourney for (this can either be for commercial or personal work). Get a clear picture in your brain of what you want and insert your prompt into MidJourney after typing in /imagine. Iterate and adapt your prompt as needed until you are satisfied. Post your work in Circle along with your prompt for others to see.

2. Group Prompt: Put your heads together. In groups of 3-5 think of an application for MidJourney that the group would like to explore and iterate together until the ideal result is attained. Change up the prompt as needed. Make sure to post in Circle!

3. Go through the community feed and analyze prompts to see how the result came about. Take notes on what's working and use this knowledge in your next rendering.

4. Create an inspiration collection. Grab images you admire and organize both the images and their prompts into a Notion file or organizational system of your choosing. Make sure to follow creators you admire to keep the inspiration coming.

5. Extra Credit: Once you're happy with a result from a MidJourney rendering, bring the image into Photoshop to create your ideal results, either using the tips Chris offered or your own design expertise.

MidJourney Hot Tips:

1. Use a newbie room when you're getting started to test the waters.

2. Separate commands in your prompt with two semicolons (;;)

3. Use this prompt generator if you aren't ready to come up with your own or are feeling stuck.

4. Use the /relax command if you are okay waiting a bit longer for your rendering to finish (and use fewer credits while you're at it).

5. Remember why it's called MidJourney. It's your job to get the journey started by providing the right prompt and figuring out what the algorithm can read. From there, it's your job to finish the journey by iterating and adapting within the system and/or finalizing your design on a separate platform.
