The article discusses the differences between "die of" and "die from", two expressions that convey similar meaning but have distinct uses and connotations. ===== In general, "die of" is used to describe a person's death due to a specific illness, disease, or condition. For example, "She died of cancer last year." In contrast, "die from" is used to describe a person's death caused by a specific external factor or event, such as an accident, injury, or natural disaster. For instance, "He died from severe injuries sustained in the accident." Another key difference between the two expressions is their usage in formal and informal writing. While both can be used in either context, "die of" is more commonly used to describe a person's death due to a medical condition, whereas "die from" is often used when describing a death caused by an external factor. The article also touches on the use of these expressions in everyday conversations, highlighting that they convey different impressions depending on how they are used. For example, using "die of" might suggest that the person's death was due to a specific illness or condition, whereas using "die from" implies that their death was caused by an external factor. Finally, the article notes that these expressions have different impacts and implications, with "die of" generally having a more limited scope and "die from" covering a broader range of causes and effects. Overall, understanding the nuances of these two expressions can help individuals communicate more effectively in both formal and informal settings.cast的意思是骰子已经掷下，die的意思是骰子的掷下也可以表示事已定局、木已成舟，不容反悔。cast的过去式是cast, die的过去式是died, cast的现在分词是casting, die的现在分词是dying。_cast_
