Learn about the TV show's history and trivia questions in our category dedicated to "Who Wants To Be A Millionaire". In the original format, contestants needed to answer 15 questions correctly to win a million dollars. Only 11 winners achieved this feat from 1999 to 2003. Regis Philbin famously told Kim Hunt's mother to "Get that closet ready" when her son won a million dollars. Two levels guaranteed the contestant a certain amount of money: $1,000 and $32,000. These points were reached at specific question marks. Joe Trela and Nancy Christy used their lifelines before reaching the $32,000 level. The correct answer for the fifteenth question was D. The answers to these questions made the millionaires: John Carpenter - B; Dan Blonsky - C; Joe Trela - A; Bob House - C; Kim Hunt - A; David Goodman - B; Kevin Olmstead - A; Bernie Cullen - A; Ed Toutant - C; Kevin Smith - A; Nancy Christy - C. In the original version, contestants had three lifelines to use throughout the game. You have three lifelines to help you out: Ask the Audience, 50:50, and Phone-a-Friend. The lifelines have changed over the years, with different dollar amounts associated with each one. Dan Blonsky used his last lifeline, Phone-a-Friend, on a question worth $500,000. A contestant could walk away with their winnings at any time, making the game unique in that aspect. They could also choose to continue without using any lifelines. The original series was hosted by Regis Philbin, while Meredith Vieira took over hosting duties for the syndicated version. On the million-dollar question, contestant Donna phoned her friend Isaac Newton, who answered correctly. The "clock format" was introduced in 2008 to speed up the game. In this format, contestants had 15 seconds to answer questions one through five and 30 seconds for six through ten. For the final question, worth $1 million, contestants had 45 seconds plus any remaining time from previous questions. This rule rarely came into play until it was used in a special anniversary series hosted by Regis Philbin.
