Nonfiction texts offer essential learning tools for our 3rd, 4th and 5th graders. To help students understand these texts better, we've developed a set of posters that explain the most common nonfiction features. Each poster clearly defines a feature using simple language and includes visuals to guide students during independent reading. By utilizing these anchor charts, you can save time typically spent creating lessons on text features and focus on other aspects of your teaching. The resource includes 20 ready-to-print anchor charts that cover various features such as: - Caption/Graph Diagram - Heading - Hyperlink or Icon - Illustration - Index - Glossary - Guide Words - Keywords - Labels - Maps - Photograph - Subheading - Subtitle - Table of Contents - Textbox - Timeline - Title - Title Page These charts are designed to be versatile and can be used in various ways, including: - Printing half-page versions for students' journals - Sharing digital versions via Google Classroom - Providing fill-in versions for note-taking during lessons The anchor charts come in two formats: half-page and full-page, ensuring they suit your teaching style. With clear language and easy-to-read fonts, these charts will help your students understand text features effectively. Here are some examples of how teachers have successfully used a text feature anchor chart in their classrooms: Teachers like you have shared that this resource is "Great" and has helped them teach text features effectively. Some have even created booklets with mini-posters for their students to use as a reference. There are six different examples of text feature anchor charts available, each designed to meet the needs of students at different grade levels. These anchors would be great for introducing students to text features or providing additional practice for those who already know them. One example uses real-life images from old magazines to explain the purpose and name of different text features. This resource is perfect for upper-elementary students or groups working together on a cooperative learning activity. For students who are familiar with identifying different types of text features, this anchor chart provides additional practice on how they help readers. Another option is to create a slideshow of free text feature charts that can be used as an introduction to the concept.
