Poppa's house episode guide

Sitcoms are making a comeback... sort of. NBC and CBS are reviving old-fashioned comedies that would've fit right in three decades ago: Happy's Place (starring Reba McEntire) and Poppa's House (pairing Damon Wayans with his son Damon Wayans Jr.). Both shows feature seasoned vets cracking jokes, but unfortunately, they're missing the laughs. Happy's Place reunites McEntire with her Reba co-star Melissa Peterman and executive producer Kevin Abbott. Here, Reba plays Bobbie, a Tennessee bar owner who learns she has a younger half-sister, Isabella (Belissa Escobedo), who owns half the bar along with her. The show is a throwback to Cheers, playing loud, broad punchlines mostly centered around Bobbie and Isabella's generational divide. Peterman is a saving grace, able to turn tired jokes into laughs, and her chemistry with McEntire shines through. The problem lies with Escobedo's Isabella, who's self-righteous and not likable, making her an awkward fit. By straddling two eras, Happy's Place feels shaky. Poppa's House exists to get Wayans and Wayans Jr. on screen together... but it has to bend over backwards to justify their characters' shared scenes. They're stuck in unrelated storylines that don't work. Poppa (Wayans Sr.) is a stubborn radio DJ who pairs up with Dr. Ivy Reed (Essence Atkins), while Junior (Wayans Jr.) is a foam roller salesman trying to become a film director, but has to keep his wife Nina (Tetona Jackson) and father-in-law JJ (Geoffrey Owens) happy. Poppa's House is hampered by hacky punchlines and poor treatment of its female characters, who are portrayed as annoying nags getting in the way. The current state of television is underwhelming, with many shows relying on outdated humor and formulaic storylines. "Poppa's House" is a prime example, where the female characters are often left out of the fun, watching as Poppa and Junior take center stage. The show's desperation is palpable, resorting to airing bloopers at the end of each episode. However, there are moments of comedic gold when Wayans and Wayans Jr. improvise and try to one-up each other. In contrast, "Happy's Place" has more potential for growth, thanks to Peterman's energetic performance. Unfortunately, both shows are stuck in the past, relying on tired tropes and lacking substance. The fall TV season is also marked by a shift towards unscripted programming, as networks prioritize cheaper options over scripted shows. Despite this, there are some promising new series, such as "Matlock," "High Potential," and "Brilliant Minds," which offer more sophisticated storytelling. On the comedy front, "St. Denis Medical" and "Poppa's House" show promise, but the best new comedy is actually FX's "English Teacher." As for new shows, "Universal Basic Guys" is another animated comedy from Fox, while "Rescue Hi-Surf" is a lifeguard drama set in Hawaii. "The Wranglers" is a docu-series that follows the lives of staff at a Montana dude ranch. Overall, the TV landscape is evolving, with a mix of old and new, but it's clear that some shows are still struggling to find their footing. Brilliant Minds, NCIS: Origins, and St. Denis Medical are some of the TV shows airing on different nights this week. "Brilliant Minds", starring Pittsburgh native Zachary Quinto as Dr. Oliver Wolf, aired last Tuesday at 10 p.m. NBC. The show follows the life of a brilliant doctor with a rule-breaking approach to solving medical mysteries. On Wednesday night, "Joan" aired on The CW at 9 p.m., which is a limited series based on the true story of Joan Hannington, a single mother who became a jewel thief in mid-1980s England. In addition to St. Denis Medical, NCIS: Origins, and several other shows are scheduled for different nights throughout this week. Happy's Place is a light-hearted sitcom that follows Bobbie McEntire, who inherits her father's restaurant with the help of her half-sister. The show boasts an entertaining cast, including Reba McEntire and Melissa Peterman, but may become repetitive with its sisterly squabbles. The plot outline for the Canadian French-language series "Poppa's House" (2024) remains unclear. However, a synopsis of an American series with the same name is available, detailing the story of Junior and Nina as they seek financial assistance from their parents to cover tuition costs after their son receives acceptance into a prestigious private school. Poppa initially disapproves of the idea but is eventually convinced by his ex-wife and Nina's father that investing in his grandson's education is worthwhile. The show revolves around a happily divorced talk-radio host, navigating challenges at work with a new female co-host and at home with his adult son. The series features a talented cast, including Damon Wayans Jr. alongside his father, as well as other notable members of the Wayans family contributing to the writing room. "Poppa's House" is set to premiere on CBS on October 21, 2024, at 8:30 p.m. EST/PST, with episodes available live and on demand for Paramount+ subscribers. The first season consists of 13 episodes, though details on episode count have not been confirmed by CBS. Poppa's House, a new sitcom starring Damon Wayans and his son Damon Wayans Jr., revolves around the life of Poppa, a legendary talk radio host who faces challenges at work and home. With the addition of a new female co-host, Ivy, played by Essence Atkins, Poppa's point of view is put to the test. The show also explores Poppa's relationship with his adult son, Damon Jr., as he tries to balance being a responsible father and husband with pursuing his passion. The CBS multi-cam "Poppa's House" serves as a suitable companion to its Monday night counterpart, "The Neighborhood." The series reunites New Girl's Schmidt and Coach in the same comedy block, showcasing their on-screen chemistry. However, it's the interplay between the Damons that truly makes this show special - something more primal than just chemistry. You may find yourself enjoying the cast's palpable enthusiasm, but wishing for more depth beyond "the cast is having fun." Created by Senior and Kevin Hench, "Poppa's House" follows Poppa, a beloved New York City radio host struggling with ratings due to a "female problem." The station pairs Poppa with self-help guru Ivy, who aims to help him connect with his emotions. Living next door is Junior, an aspiring filmmaker and his wife Nina, an event planner whose dad owns the company that employs Junior. The show explores their generational differences on parenting, particularly since Junior was largely raised by his mom. However, more often than not, it's about the Damons trying to outdo each other with humor. The outtakes suggest a mostly improvised approach, which explains some fallbacks and repetitive targets like Jackson's height or Senior's physical antics. Despite this, the warmth in this family comes from their playful banter and love of making each other laugh, even if it means being goofy. The show excels when it focuses on the lighthearted and playful interactions between Nina and Junior, with the overall convivial atmosphere making up for some of the narrative shortcomings. Poppa's House is still experimenting with its plot, relying on the charm of the Wayans family to carry the show until it finds its footing. Initially, the series balances domestic sitcom and workplace comedy elements, but as it progresses, it simplifies its format by transitioning into a podcast setup. This change makes the show more straightforward, but also somewhat limited. The fifth episode stands out as it explores themes of discipline and family dynamics, featuring humorous moments from Damon Junior and hinting at a potential romance between Poppa and Ivy. Although the show's themes may be familiar, its draw lies in the chemistry and collaborative spirit among the Wayans family members, making Poppa's House feel unique despite its generic premise. The family's rapport and banter are the main attractions, and their tangible connection keeps the show from feeling too formulaic.
