Cleaning rod guide

Bore Tech Rimfire Bore Guides offer precise alignment with rifle bores to prevent damage and ensure proper cleaning and protection. These guides are CNC machined from rugged polymer and feature a tapered rear opening for easy jag/brush alignment. With custom-made designs specific to each rifle model, they minimize cleaners leaking into the action and eliminate wear on the ejector. Cleaning rods for firearms typically have a handle at one end and threading at the other to attach cleaning accessories, such as brushes and solvent holders, allowing users to push them through the barrel to clean the bore. To prevent solvent from spilling out, a breech-end extension tube, known as a bore guide or rod guide, is often used in conjunction with the cleaning rod. Similarly, muzzle guides or guards may be employed when inserting the rod from the muzzle end to protect the crown from damage. Cleaning cords are an alternative tool that use a flexible cord with a tapered tip and weight attached to it, helping to feed the cord through the breech and then dragging it towards the muzzle while scrubbing the bore. These cords often feature integrated brushes for clearing stubborn contaminants and may also be used to apply lubricants. The screw thread sizes and genders used for attaching brushes to rods vary between calibers and manufacturers, requiring corresponding brushes and accessories with the opposite gender.
