It's run by the French Football Federation and has been held since 1917. The tournament is open to all amateur and professional clubs in France, including those from overseas territories. The final takes place at the Stade de France, and the winner gets a spot in the UEFA Europa League group stage and the Trophe des Champions match. The competition also features a women's version called Coupe de France Fminine. Due to its structure with random draws and one-off matches, bigger clubs often struggle to win it. This usually benefits amateur clubs, as higher-ranked teams are forced to play away from home when drawn against lower-league opponents. Only three amateur clubs have made it to the final since professionalism was introduced in 1932: Calais RUFC in 2000, US Quevilly in 2012, and Les Herbiers VF in 2018. Paris Saint-Germain is the reigning champion, having defeated Lyon in the 2023-24 final. The competition has been around for over a century, with its first edition featuring just 48 clubs due to minimal requirements for entry. By 1948, this number had increased to 1,000, and today it's much higher.The Coupe de France features over 7,000 clubs, with a gradual increase in the number of participating teams since its inception. Initially, preliminary rounds were introduced starting from the 191920 season, with additional rounds added each subsequent year. The competition has evolved to include eight regional rounds, some of which feature up to ten regional matches. The first-ever Coupe de France winner was Olympique de Pantin, who defeated FC Lyon in a 3-0 victory at the Stade de la Lgion Saint-Michel in Paris. Over the years, the competition has shifted between various stadiums, including the Parc des Princes and the Stade Pershing. The final has been held at several venues, with the largest attendance recorded at the renovated Parc des Princes. The competition regularly produces upsets, with amateur clubs often surprising professionals. One notable example is the 1957 upset win by SCU El Biar over Stade de Reims, featuring renowned players like Robert Jonquet and Just Fontaine. More recently, Championnat de France amateur club Calais RUFC reached the final in 1999-2000, showcasing their home-field advantage after playing all their matches at home. Despite this, professional clubs have expressed discontent with the competition's rules, particularly those regarding hosting duties and stadium conditions, leading to the creation of the Coupe de la Ligue.Amateur clubs have been moving their Coupe de France matches to more established stadiums, primarily to increase revenue through ticket sales. The winner of the competition gets to keep the trophy for a year before returning it to the French Football Federation. Interestingly, the cup was once stolen in the early 1980s but was quickly recovered by authorities. Since 1927, the President of France has consistently attended the final and presented the trophy to the winning captain.The Coupe de France is a knockout tournament where teams are drawn against each other randomly, with ties played as single legs. If matches end in draws, penalties are held. Prior to 1967, the competition used replays instead of extra time or penalty shootouts, but this changed after three consecutive draws between Olympique Lyonnais and Angoulme CFC.The tournament features 14 rounds, with regions in France playing their own matches until the 7th round when professional clubs enter. Clubs are then randomly drawn against each other, regardless of region. Overseas departments and territories also hold knockout competitions, allowing a limited number of teams to qualify for the Coupe de France. The winning team receives the trophy and qualifies for the UEFA Europa League, with potential additional qualification through the league table.Teams progress through various rounds of the competition:- National 2 teams enter at the fourth round stage. - National teams compete in the fifth round stage. - Ligue 2 teams reach the seventh round stage. - Ligue 1 teams participate in the round of 64 stage.In Coupe de France matches, shirt numbers 120 are reserved for players.
